

As discussed at length above, there are numerous risks inherent in the technological advances that are gaining widespread acceptance in the banking industry. In certain respects, the laws that have attempted to accommodate such advances sometimes leave open the question of allocation of risk for certain other losses. As a practical matter, banks that continue to push the envelope and offer a vast array of products and services are doing so at their own risk. As banks make business decisions to incorporate services such as remote deposit capture and to accept remotely created checks, it is imperative that carefully drafted customer agreements are in place that shift liability onto the customer if such a loss occurs. And insurers will ultimately have to draw lines in the sand, making clear to their insured banks that there are certain risks they are not willing to cover.